Here's how the other half feels: Women's take on cash schemes

In the space of a decade, Afana Khatun's sari ka kaani — she stitched saris — for the neighbourhood women in Jharkhand's Latehar, dried up. Her hands were busy with the saris, but her mind was elsewhere. She was a woman in a man's world, and she was not alone. She was one of the many women in Jharkhand who were struggling to make ends meet. She was a woman in a man's world, and she was not alone. She was one of the many women in Jharkhand who were struggling to make ends meet.

helped strengthen our resolve," she adds. In state after state, whether Bengal, Madhya Pradesh, Karnataka or most recently Maharashtra and Jharkhand, women's empowerment is being championed by political parties, and 'mahila baharathis' (women beneficiaries) has become the new buzzword. Schemes are targeted specifically at women, whether it is free bus rides or straight-up cash delivered directly into bank accounts. As women's voter participation in elections with every successive poll — in the Lok Sabha polls in May this year 34 crore women cast their vote as compared to about 20 crore in 2019 — there is an acceptance that engaging with women can have many benefits. Kankshi Agarwal, founder of Netri, which works on political empowerment of women, says "Political parties know that women are making informed choices, and are less likely to discuss those choices at home," she says. This, she says, is reflective of higher education, better access to information, and greater autonomy and agency, and is driving a shift in the voting space. Economics professor at OP Jindal Global University, Deepanshu Mohan, agrees that just like caste and class, gender is now recognised as an identity by parties. These cash transfers have an impact on the positional agency of women in Mahayashtra. They are most effective when targeted at high-concentration, low-development areas. "As more women vote there is a consolidation of the women's vote in poorer rural districts. For instance, in Vidarbha, an area marked by farmer debt and agrarian distress, cash transfers as small as Rs 1,500 a month made a difference. The 'dole' might not sway the vote, but it could influence it, as we have seen in Maharashtra, Jharkhand and MP," Prof Mohan says. This appears true for women voters across states who have been beneficiaries of cash transfer schemes. In Maharashtra, cash transfers appeared to have softened the anti-incumbency that found strong expression in parliamentary polls just months before.
